HONORABLE SERVICE

Long and Active Officer of General John M. Wilson.

BORN IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON

How He Happened to Go to West Point.

HIS FUTURE PLANS

The retirement of Brigadier General John M. Wilson, chief of engineers, United States army, from active service in his corps marks a stage of progress in a most honorable career. It will not be a retirement in the sense of the ending of useful service, for General Wilson, who has always known a busy life, has already planned to perform work which he has not had time to attend to during the more active period of his life. His personal affairs will require attention, and he proposes writing of the events in the life of the character in which he has either played an active part or of which he has been an observer. Much of his work has been for the welfare of this city, and he looks forward to its further improvement with great interest.

A Native of This City.
General Wilson was born in the District of Columbia October 8, 1837, and he always regarded this city with feelings of affection. His birthplace was on G street nearly opposite the Epiphany Church. His father was also born here in 1801, and he was near the corner of 12th. His grandfather on his mother's side came here in 1822 from Philadelphia. Among the papers preserved by or for General Wilson is a letter written by his mother July 3, 1847, to his uncle in Philadelphia, describing the Fourth of July celebration in this city on the previous day. The ties of family and his own early life here combined to give him an added interest in the development and beautifying of the capital.

Gen. Wilson started out to earn his own living when he was little more than twelve years old. He became a page on the floor of the Senate in December, 1849, and some of his most pleasant memories are of that time. He was a member of the Senate from 1854 to 1859, and the great men whose names are familiar to every schoolboy and who were then performing the great work of their lives. He was a member of the Senate from 1854 to 1859, and the great men whose names are familiar to every schoolboy and who were then performing the great work of their lives. He was a member of the Senate from 1854 to 1859, and the great men whose names are familiar to every schoolboy and who were then performing the great work of their lives.

Went to California.
Before young Wilson was sixteen years of age Wm. M. Givins told him he could go to California with him if he wanted to strike out for himself, and he made the trip by way of Aspinwall, going across the Isthmus of Panama partly on muleback and partly by the railroad, which was not then completed. After arriving at San Francisco he worked his way into Oregon and to Olympia, Wash., and then to Seattle, where he had experience, which was influential in adding to the sturdy and rugged character of Gen. Wilson. He reached Olympia after a ride of thirty miles across the country and a lonely journey in a canoe with an Indian for his guide. He was tired and hungry, and finally secured a room, which was divided over a house. The next morning the players could not disturb his rest. Olympia was then a town of 150 whites and 300 Indians. The next morning the young traveler started out to find something to do, and before the day was over he had a situation which paid him $125 a month. For a strange boy in a strange land he was getting on. That was in January, 1854, and in the following December the delegate of the territory of Washington, Columbus Lancaster, said he had a boy for appointment to West Point.

Sent to West Point.
Young Wilson was well known to the governor and other officials of the territory, and they at once took an interest in him, with the result that he secured the West Point appointment. In the spring of 1855 he went to San Francisco and came back to the east over the Nicaragua canal route. He crossed the country on horseback to the lake, where he took a boat, and after going over that magnificent body of water, went down the San Juan river to Greytown, which then had a fine harbor. Arriving in this country he entered West Point, and he remained here for five years, which was then the required term. In 1860 he was graduated, and soon the war was given him the distinction of a hazardous and honorable service. For one year he served as assistant ordnance officer at Fort Monroe, Virginia, and at the Washington Arsenal, and then he was stationed at the Military Academy as assistant professor of Spanish, but in the summer of the same year was again actively engaged as an engineer in the construction of defenses of Baltimore. Mosby was threatening the city and it became necessary to hastily construct works of defense.

General Schenck ordered Captain Wilson to go to Druid Hill Park, cut down the trees and utilize them in the work of defense. Proceeding to this duty Wilson found himself in a magnificent grove of trees that it would have taken a century or two to duplicate. It was too much for him to destroy these magnificent trees under the need was imperative, and he went back to General Schenck and the order was modified so that the trees were to come down when it became absolutely necessary to use them. That moment came and the people of Baltimore still have Druid Hill Park, with its splendid grove of trees, and they have often felt grateful to the man who saved them. Captain Wilson was later made superintendent engineer of the construction of defense works at Annapolis and Natchez, and later assistant inspector general of the military division of west Mississippi from May 26, 1864, to September 15, 1865. On July 1, 1866, he was brevetted colonel of United States volunteers for faithful and meritorious services during the campaign against the city of Mobile and the Cascades, Oregon, and other work in that part of the country. He was assistant chief of engineers in this city from October 26, 1862, to December 18, 1866, and in charge of public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia from June 1, 1865, to September 7, 1869. He was also in charge of improvements over the grave of Thomas Jefferson, at Monticello, Va.; erection of a monument to mark the ### Career Since the War.

Since the war Gen. Wilson has been engaged in a large number of important engineering works. He made the survey for what is known as the northern transportation route from the great lakes to tide water in New York. He also made surveys for the improvement of the Willamette, Columbia and Snake rivers; a canal around the Cascades, Oregon, and other work in that part of the country. He was assistant chief of engineers in this city from October 26, 1862, to December 18, 1866, and in charge of public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia from June 1, 1865, to September 7, 1869. He was also in charge of improvements over the grave of Thomas Jefferson, at Monticello, Va.; erection of a monument to mark the
